“Lovefficiency” is a new, yet controversial term, which requires some development, through trial and error. Just as we would test the number and nature of samples and record those results, we need to start keeping track of the potentially successful method of application/implementation.

Every time one experiences a way or method, they’ll have a rapid response to a request (meaning an efficient method, in an effective and quick manner).

Define what love is, and define what efficiency is, and then tweak the two.

When a respondent acts in a spirit of joy and affection (delight), it is a process of responding to a request in an effective and rapid manner, while developing a sense of “job well done,” out of duty, it is bound to produce satisfaction and delight.

A good adjective to define the combination of love and efficiency is “lovefficient” as well as the noun itself of “loveefficiency.” In a recent study, and development of a new idea and concept, the results have shown an extraordinary breakthrough.

Lovefficient - One who is lovefficient responds to a question, request, or an expressed need from another with a spirit of joy and acceptance (delight), as well as in an effective and rapid manner. To be lovefficient, one must respond with pure motives as well, even if admitting to not knowing the answer, however the delivery of such a response should be joyous and loving.

Loveefficiency - the act of responding to a question, request, or expressed need from another with a spirit of joy and acquiescence (delight), as well as in an effective and rapid manner. In a climate of loveefficiency, one must respond with pure motives as well, even if admitting to not knowing the answer, the delivery of the response should be joyous and loving.
